COURSE OBJECTIVES

This course has developed out of the consensus among Middle East experts that a proper understanding of recent events in the Middle East requires more than a casual or narrowly-focused knowledge of the cultural, social, historical, economic, religious and political background of these events. This course will provide students with an opportunity to study, through an in-depth interdisciplinary approach, one of the world’s most complex yet important regions which, except for its crises, is virtually ignored in the news media of most Western countries. This course will seek to illuminate the host of factors underlying contemporary issues in the Middle East and in some North African and Central Asian countries. History, Anthropology, Economics, Political Science, Literature and Religious studies perspectives will all be embedded within the course. The role of shared and divergent values across these various ethnic and religious groups will be considered as the issues of conflict, peace and security are studied. The ultimate goal of the course is to provide the students with an enlarged perspective in which to understand developments in the region. The first 15 minutes of each session will be devoted to discussion and analyses of daily developments in Middle Eastern countries.
